He is Here: How do you fall in love after you've lost the love of your life? John Brandon Keever

How do you fall in love after you've lost the love of your life? For Iraqi War widow and single mother Sara, love seemed like a distant memory. Until she met Jack, a handsome volunteer at a local mission. And a man with a past of his own. Second chances begin in the heart. Love anew with He is Here.

Q You are an Author and a Filmmaker. Did He is Here almost become a movie before the novel was ever written?

A That's correct. I had written a script based on a play I had produced in 2012. I began pitching He is Here to investors and producers. We had a strong team of actors and producers behind the film. I wanted to Direct and Produce the movie. We were trying to raise nearly a million dollars for my first feature film. We raised nearly a third of our budget, but ran out of time. When I financing failed I took it personally. I didn't really write or create anything for 6 months.

Q Was the novel a way to get the story out when the feature film failed or was it always something you intend to create?

A Yes to both. I have novels still on hard drives that I had written back in college. I think they are horrible. I think a lot of what I've produced is horrible. Maybe that's just a creative quirk, but it's true with me. I never really considered publishing any of my work. Granted, I've produced sketches, plays, and commercials, but for some reason novels and films were always something more mystical to me. He is Here was always going to become a novel. It only took three years!

Q He is Here has some really powerful scenes from the very beginning, Sara grieving her husband years after he died in the Iraqi War, a young pregnant teen is kicked out of her home by her wealthy mother, child abuse etc. Why are you willing to be so bold with these kinds of characters and stories?

A I believe truth is best experienced. I am passionate about creating stories for the untold souls. Respect is critical to honorably revealing the truth in their stories. I felt inspired to tell the story of a military widow, a homeless teen, and victims of child abuse; the unheard.

Q Sara is a respected nurse, a loving mom, and a great sister, but she is lonely since her husband passed. Jack is a very successful Realtor and a respected businessman, yet he is a bit of a workaholic because he is still hurting since his wife died of cancer. How do you relate to Sara or Jack?

A I lost a very close friend to cancer when I was in my 20s. I was actually her prom date. We dated some after high school, but we knew we were better off friends. She had several bouts of cancer and lost her fight too young. I still think about her. Losing her gave me an appreciation for love at a young age. Loneliness is not always the loss of an emotion but often the absence of a person. Sara misses Tyler as a husband, father, and friend. But she knows he's gone. Jack misses Lindsay deeply. He misses what they shared and regrets what could have been. Sara and Jack deal with grief in their own way. Their loneliness is in no way disrespectful of their loved ones. I do not believe love is something you prepare for, I think it's something you find and if you have any sense; you make the most out of who you get to share it with because you never know how much time you've got together. <?p>

Q Sara, a military widow, and Jack, a breast cancer widower fall in love. Did you ever think this might offend some readers?

A Yes. But it will probably offend readers who are not widows or widowers. I think readers can really see that Sara had real love with Tyler and Jack knew real love with Lindsay. They found love again with each other. Many families have a hard time when a parent or loved one falls in love with someone new after losing their spouse. But have they really asked their parent or loved one how they feel? We never know how many days we get to live and love on this earth. Love every moment you get.
